Announced Today: Supreme Court Will Not Take Up NYC Rent Regulation Case

The Supreme Court today turned down a challenge to New York City’s long-standing rent regulations. The case, Community Housing Improvement Program v. City of New York, New York, was based on the claim that New York's Rent Stabilization Law was an unconstitutional regulatory and physical taking. The challenge also asserted the law violates the Constitution’s due process clause.

“The decision doesn't change the fact that we have education to do to really push back on a lot of the misinformation around rent control,” NMHC President Sharon Wilson Géno told Bisnow today.

While the Supreme Court did not grant the writ of certiorari on this specific case, several other pending cases exist on rent regulations. We will provide updates on new cases as they progress through the courts.

Government Shutdown Averted (For Now)

After a whirlwind weekend of negotiations, Congress came together to pass a Continuing Resolution (CR) that will keep the government running for 45 more days while lawmakers debate a final appropriations package. The President signed this temporary fix into law late Saturday night.
While a shutdown would have a number of implications for the broader economy, it could also derail various programs that multifamily owners, operators and developers utilize.

Because the shutdown impacts HUD, EPA and other government agency operations, programs like rental assistance, Energy Star, NFIP and more are at risk.

NMHC continues to be highly engaged with members of Congress to educate them on industry impacts and encourage them to work together to avoid a shutdown in November. Read More
