

Tushar Kansal works with Pew's housing policy initiative, providing research and analysis on ways to increase housing availability and safe home financing. Kansal also engages with foundations, nonprofits, businesses, and community organizations to build broad-based support for increasing access to safe and affordable financing and housing availability. Prior to joining the housing team, Kansal worked in Pew's strategy department for five years and was previously a public policy consultant and mediator at the Consensus Building Institute. Kansal holds a bachelor's degree in social studies from Wesleyan University and a master's degree in urban planning from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.
